Why should I care how my developer saves its work?

Because that software is your software.

Companies are regularly going to the wall these days – and if your software developer goes into administration, they'll take the source code for your computer systems with them...

...that would leave you unable to update or fix any problems, and effectively having to start afresh.

That's where secure software escrow comes in: giving you peace of mind and confidence that, no matter that happens, the software that you have paid for will continue to be usable and fixable.

Escrow services involve a third party storing source code securely and with watertight legal protection.

Intellect has been providing software escrow services for over 30 years.

We will keep the source code for your software safe and secure in our vault with one of the leading data storage companies in the UK.

I'm an end user – so why should I bother with software escrow?

- The costs of finding replacement software could be prohibitive.
- The time it takes to find replacement software could damage or even destroy your business or organisation.
- Without software escrow, you could be gambling everything on the reliability of the software owner.
- You may be legally obliged to use software escrow.
- It means you'll be able to fix, maintain, and/or develop the software in-house if things go wrong.
- It's an insurance policy against default by the software owner.
- It's an essential part of your business or organisation's risk management.
